

WARNING, YOU ARE HERE

by

William Augustus Eddins

May, 2018

Director of Thesis: Amber Flora Thomas

Major Department: English

Traumatic events can provoke introspection in a person's life and possibly cause an existential crisis, or, depression. These conscious thoughts offer a new perception of life as the individual understands that they define their own meaning and purpose to life. This leads to a series of choices. Those choices are often filled with the mundane, "everydayness" of life. Attempting to accept normalcy and navigate the mundane can lead to frustration, even recycling the individual back to a constant search for purpose and meaning. Poetry, as an art form, provides modules that can present mundane moments and use them to create a larger piece that recycles and searches for purpose and meaning, much like an individual.

WARNING, YOU ARE HERE

A Thesis

Presented To the Faculty of the Department of English

East Carolina University

In Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for a Masters of Art in English

by

William Augustus Eddins

May, 2018

© William Augustus Eddins, 2018

WARNING, YOU ARE HERE

by

William Augustus Eddins

APPROVED BY:

DIRECTOR OF THESIS:

Amber Flora Thomas, MFA

COMMITTEE MEMBER:

John Hoppenthaler, MFA

COMMITTEE MEMBER:

James Kirkland, Ph.D.

CHAIR OF THE
DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH:

Marianne Montgomery, Ph.D.

DEAN OF THE GRADUATE SCHOOL:

Paul J. Gemperline, Ph.D.

Acknowledgments

I am grateful to the editors of the following publications in which two of my poems first appeared.

Atlantis Magazine: “I Want My Bonsai Tree Back”

Deep South Magazine: “What My Father Left Behind”

I would also like to thank all the wonderful mentors who have helped my writing evolve; Amber Flora Thomas, I owe much to your mentorship during the creation of this manuscript; John Hoppenthaler, poetry was alien to me until I participated in your workshop; Liza Wieland, your support and class welcomed me into a community of writers; Bob Siegel, for helping me become more confident in my work; and Luke Whisnant, for encouraging me to step outside my comfort zone and trust my “writer brain.”

A special thank you is in order for my family. Even though we are never perfect, we are always there for one another. And, of course, this manuscript would not be possible without the unwavering love and support of my partner, Jennifer.

Table of Contents

HOW TO HIDE A DEAD BODY.....	1
WHY WE MIGHT LAST .....	2
LAYOVER IN DALLAS .....	3
I WANT MY BONSAI TREE BACK.....	4
THE FIVE-YEAR ANNIVERSARY OF THE DAY I CONTEMPLATED SUICIDE.....	5
CLONE .....	6
SITTING IN THE RECLINER WHILE MOM WATCHES THE SIX O’CLOCK NEWS.....	7
LEARNING TO DRIVE .....	8
BASEBALL.....	9
WARNING.....	10
THAT NIGHT YOUR ROOMMATE MADE YOU DOGSIT AND WE DRANK THREE BOTTLES OF MOSCATO.....	11
LUNCH POEM FOR CHARLIE, APRIL 16 TH , 2017 .....	12
WHAT MY FATHER LEFT BEHIND.....	13
ARS POETICA.....	14
VICTORY.....	15
HOW TO BE THE THIRD BORN AND ONLY BOY .....	16
WHAT I REALLY WANT .....	17
MY MOTHER IN 1998.....	18
THE HAMMER TRICK.....	19
DISPATCHES .....	20
SINGING IN THE KITCHEN, YOU TELL ME YOU LOVE ME.....	21
TO KILL A SKUNK .....	22
MAYBE, WE’LL WAKE UP AND IT WILL ALL BE A DREAM.....	23

How to Hide a Dead Body

A half mile from exit 82, somewhere between endless fields of soy beans and shadows cast by Carolina pines, you ask me if I could get away with murder.

“Of course, I could,” I replied, sure that disposing a body was easy enough. You claimed that if the murder was clean – something personal, attached, like strangling, then disposing a body would be my only challenge.

However, if the murder was messy (wounds, blood, gore, real Tarantino type stuff) then I would have to worry about a crime scene, too.

I explained how the Cali cartel would wrap victims tight in barbwire and dump them into the river. When their bodies bloated, the razors burst them to shreds;

fish food, they called it.
We ate sushi that evening and discussed “what if’s.” Somewhere between open relationships and celebrity crushes, I thought about those pieces of flesh carried by the river, drifting and bobbing farther from the truth.

Why We Might Last

Because you say things like I'm going to stab you. Because you curse at your mother after tuning in and out of her exacting afternoon phone call. Because when I bump my head on the countertop you cackle, your eyes expecting my grin. Because you burnt holes in the interior of my car door with cigarettes.
Because you grab my ass in public – then, when I'm no longer startled my crotch. And the night before our graduation, when my uncle was struck dead by a bolt of lightning you ran your fingers through my hair as I fell asleep to the taste of tears.

Layover in Dallas

Send me the bill and I will pay no matter how many tiny liquor bottles we drank out of the mini bar in Room 202. We laid in bed studying the tan wallpaper peeling from the corners, exposing cherry red paint beneath.

It reminded you of a barn.
It reminded me of blood.

We watched A Nightmare on Elm Street and you let me play with your hair.
It smelled like lavender and you said the trick was dry shampoo and dipping your brush in perfume.

You fell asleep by the third act, so I left a note by your luggage with my number.

I Want My Bonsai Tree Back

the one we planned to plant deep in the pines,
off the asphalt trail
from D.C. to Purcellville.

It had that twisted trunk that grew towards stars and swayed back,
balancing evergreen clouds.

For years, we trimmed tiny needles to look like Hiroshima Survivor<sup>1</sup>.

Then one passive winter, we watched it over-
grow the pot
and droop onto our apartment floor.

---

<sup>1</sup> “Hiroshima Survivor” is a Japanese white pine bonsai tree that survived the atomic blast in Hiroshima on August 6, 1945.

The Five-Year Anniversary of the Day I Contemplated Suicide

I grab the blue jacket out of my closet. It's clean and I need to stay warm without any heat.
I see the shotgun in the corner.
I put on my wool socks. It occurs to me that it had been five years since I almost offed myself.
You told me that if it happened again to pick up a phone instead. I cut on the TV. Packers game. You make me swear on our relationship. I can't believe it's been five years.

Clone

I look like a clone of my father, which I don't like to admit since I've tried my whole life not to be one or both of my parents. I impersonated a good kid, graduated college.
I moved away, but visited more than just on holidays.
I found someone I love and we don't fight often. Yet when I brush my teeth, I see my father's face dripping with toothpaste. His face on my driver's license, in my rearview mirror, and in the reflection of my phone as I set my alarm and fall asleep worrying that I look too much like my father.

Sitting in the Recliner while Mom Watches the Six O'clock News

Always, Dad and I have the same conversation about where his glasses are.

Mom chides,

“They’re on his head.”

But, it looks as if there is nothing

there but silver streaks lost in dark waves that rise and fall into half curls.

I imagine them grabbing at the roots, burrowing through sawdust and skull towards his brain, hiding away those thick charcoal frames.

When he feels them,

he brushes those streaks back, slides on his reading glasses, and opens his beekeeper’s bible.

Learning to Drive

My mother, the same woman who left her car in neutral at the laundry mat causing it to roll into a parked car, taught me how to drive a stick.

I stalled at every stop and grinded the clutch until I was certain I heard the transmission beg for mercy. Then she assured me that I was anxious and it took time to be proficient. Like Michelangelo who stared at blocks of stone, knowing one day he would carve muscle and beauty,

I would one day make it out of the parking lot.

Baseball

It was boring. But I would rather pick four leaf clovers in left field and bat ninth, ducking curve balls, than be that boy
who didn't like baseball.

I doubt I would like to play now, too. Waiting to run in circles. Waiting to be the reason some line drive finds its alley. However,

I sometimes miss those uniforms with my number, matching knee-high socks, the ping when the ball ricochets off the bat. The clouds of red dirt which left permanent stains.

Warning

I'm the asshole your father warned you about. The one who will forget your birthday and daydream during conversations.

I won't defeat dragons or wake you from a curse with a single kiss, but I listen

when you whisper

the reasons

you are here.

That Night Your Roommate Made You Dogsit and We Drank Three Bottles of Moscato

I had just been fired from Target and couldn't keep from thinking about how much life sucks.

You were starving and wanted me to pick up Hibachi on my way. Two sets of chopsticks, white sauce, and enough noodles to feed a Dickensian orphanage. You poured the white sauce over your noodles. I dipped the veggies in mine.

We finished a bottle of Moscato and you asked if I could walk to the store and buy another, but remembered that the dog needed exercise so we all left together. You wore those thigh-high boots that kept my focus on your legs. Then let me unzip the boots when we returned with two more bottles.

We drank the second bottle on the porch to escape the dog farts. I broke the arm of the wooden deck chair, and you dropped a cigarette on the seat cushion. We opened the last bottle.

You were reminded of that time when your ex nearly burnt down your apartment with a stovetop fire and how you were upset because your cat, Sabrina, would have been trapped. Fuck him, you said. Fuck that almost cat killer.

We went back inside and had sex in the kitchen.

Lunch Poem for Charlie, April 16th, 2017

I've spent all morning convincing my girlfriend that her hair looks fine. Some call this Easter.
I pray for the resurrection of Charlie Chaplin on his birthday.
For communion, I want to watch
A King in New York. Search Hulu: none found. It suggests Robo Cop, American Meth, clips of Khloe and Kim Take New York. Search Prime: none found.
The Great Dictator $6.99 rent or buy; countless shorts. Search Netflix: none found. Like films: Compulsion, Orson Welles, courts, one star;
Laura, Noir classic, two and a half stars;
To Catch a Thief, my father's favorite Hitchcock film, three stars.
I opt for Roku's Charlie Chaplin channel and watch the short where Charlie lives in a cabin out in the snowy tundra, wakes up one morning and makes tea as three women gang up on another in a snowball fight outside. Charlie hears one explode against the door and opens it.
He's greeted by a snowball to the face.
Wiping the powder from his eyes, he looks up, frozen, struck by the beautiful woman at his doorstep – then struck once more by a snowball.

What My Father Left Behind

Gravel spewed from the growling sound of pistons pushing their limits.

In seconds the black sedan, tagged
Playboy, vanished into the horizon.

I picked up the basketball he left me and tried to remember his directions. Set your feet, bend your knees and follow through with your shot. I drew a breath, exhaled as it released, arching in the air, sinking inside the orange cylinder.

Ars Poetica

Poetry is naan bread dough slapped on the walls of a clay pot, cooked til' air pocket bubbles begin to crisp: scooped out and painted in butter, garlic and parsley, torn and dipped in curry sauce.

Victory

When I was twelve, my sister made me promise not to tell our parents she kissed girls.
I wasn't sure what to do with such a secret, so I planted it in the backyard near the deer femur our dog buried the previous fall.
I kissed girls, too.

I kept the secret safe until my sister came home from high school, dumped by her girlfriend.
We sobbed together.
When my father found us, he sobbed too.
Then he laughed, punched her in the arm, told her, "I knew."

How to Be the Third Born and Only Boy

Be the favorite at all times. You don't have to do much; smile when your candy stash gets busted. It helps to be pitiful, too. Be sure to cry while splinters are removed from your big toe, even though you were warned to put on shoes. It's okay to play with Barbies, but there should always be conflict. Chew with your mouth open.

Get worse grades than your sisters and beat them at Scrabble, but be there when they need someone to hear how their date left them in the parking lot and all they want is revenge.

Listen more than you talk. Don't be afraid to be afraid.

Yell if you need help, like that time when the horse kicked you in the leg and it was swollen and bruised and so heavy you shouted the birds from the trees.

What I Really Want

is to cry again.

I want you to

grin at my corny jokes, chortling when I accidentally say something genuinely funny.

We could run away together, you know?

We would probably make it harder than it needs to be.

We're such perfectionists. Okay, more like overdoers who over think and do more than they should, like say I love you too early in the relationship and spend years proving it to one another, hoping that we're right.

My Mother in 1998

would rub my hair
every night before bedtime.
Her thumb and fingertips glided from my neck, over my cranium, towards my temple,
then back again, swerving around and dodging my ears. I could never think straight

while lying there,
fluttering between the light
and the dark,
moving
from one day
into another.

The Hammer Trick

My father learned the trick nailing plywood to A frames, when those hands were thin, before jelly smashed fingernails and dislocations. Before they discovered how to exchange lost teeth with dollar bills between pillows and mattresses.

I envied those hands that showed off by placing a nail between the claw of a hammer,

one swing -

bang,

the nail a quarter way

driven into the two by four.

With a flick of the wrist, he spun the hammer around,

one swing -

bang

the nail was flush.

Dispatches

I.

I wrote a poem for the sky but it evaporated to gas, seeping through cracks in the atmosphere
drifting towards Jupiter.

II.

I wrote a poem for my mother, but she said lilies aren't pretty.
Suggested I choose lilacs instead.

III.

I wrote another poem for the sky and it sent back instructions for how to stay dry during typhoons.

IV.

I wrote another poem for my mother.
She claimed I wasn't a poet.
She suggested that I get a job fighting fires or writing headlines.

Singing in the Kitchen, You Tell Me You Love Me

Over “Tracks of My Tears,” you uttered,

I love           you.

We nearly forgot the crackling bacon popping grease, which singed your bicep.

Goddamnit, you said.

I laughed and you began to cry.

To Kill a Skunk

It's a cat in the manure pile: no.
It's a skunk: yes.

Digging for worms.

Dad is holding a stick: no.
Dad has a rifle: yes.

*Can't wash a horse
with tomato juice.*

Bang!

It's dead: no,
it's twitching.

Bang!

It's dead: yes.

Grab a shovel. Bury it: no, the dog will find it.

Put it in a trash bag: no, dump is closed on Sundays.

Toss it on the burning brush pile: no, yes.

Maybe, We'll Wake Up and It Will All Be a Dream

but until then, let's save the bees and hear ghosts whisper through walls.

Allow wind chimes to warn our sofa-sitting hearts of undead rednecks pursuing flesh so we can drop our popcorn and embrace each other.

Let the heat from our bodies combust and turn to space dust dancing around what can't really be explained

like that tattoo below your waistband, where the half-moon hides behind cursive letters I never quite learned to fashion.

